This course will expose students to a wide range of professional development skills that are essential to academic career development. We assume that class participants will be at different stages of their academic careers, ranging from graduate students working on their dissertations to postdocs who are on the job market. Class participants will have the opportunity to rehearse a job talk or other scientific presentation and receive feedback from the class.

Topics covered will include: tips for developing professional presentations; preparing and delivering presentations for various audiences; preparing C.V.'s and research, teaching & diversity statements for job applications; planning for job interviews and negotiations; issues related to publishing; and issues in the ethical conduct of research.

UCLA pre- and postdoctoral trainees and graduate students who are interested in developing professional skills in these areas are encouraged to enroll in the class.
